The Naval Academy at Annapolis and hazing Peter W. Moeller

(...) "year of excellent scholarship and deportment, unjustly dismissed from the Naval Academy at Annapolis, on an alleged charge of hazing, which was not only unsustainable, but refuted, and having made every effort to obtain a redress of the grievous wrong done to his reputation, I have concluded to present his case to the public, so that all may know the method of said Academy, and determine whether that is a proper place for the rising generation to receive that education and treatment necessary to fit them for the higher duties of manhood.

The accompanying pages will convince the most sceptic of the apparent determination of certain Government officials to discharge as many naval cadets as possible, in order to keep within the quota of naval officers authorized by law, and thus make room for new recruits, furnished as.' patronage to the Congressional representation.

Such questionable methods are bad, but when their effect is to break down the reputation of respectable and rising young men, it is hard to find a moderate word in language which correctly expresses the reprehensiveness of the practice.

I write not rashly—six months have elapsed since the so-called trial took place—and I have endeavored to reconcile myself to the result, but it is hard to believe(...)".
