Letters from the Outpost: Essays on the Cultural Cleansing of a Small Southern State challenges revisionist history and myths about Southern language, culture and even geography and about one little corner of the South. Located just below the Mason-Dixon Line, Maryland is a tiny state with a big history: It was at the center of the secession crisis of the 1860s. To understand the conflict between the North and the South, it is necessary to understand the events that took place in Maryland beginning in the spring of 1861. The first blood in the War of Secession was shed in Baltimore one April day when Northern troops marched into the city. The invasion and occupation of Maryland by the Union is an important factor in the South's defeat. Maryland's history, however, has been re-written or forgotten. Maryland's culture has been cleansed because of changing demographics. Considered today an unremarkable Northern state, no longer renowned for her mild tobacco, blooded race horses, hospitality or fine cuisine, Maryland is thought of as no more than a bedroom community for Federal workers, most of them expatriate Northerners or their descendants, employed in D.C. and Northern Virginia. The "story of Maryland," as Jefferson Davis writes in his memoirs, is "sad to the last degree," but it is a story that must be told.
