Not The Best Of Practices

As the cliché goes, “The key to team success is communication.” Most team or organization leaders are faced with the daily challenge not just on how to foster communication within the team, but more importantly, on how to encourage teamwork and build successful teams.

Success by way of a “team” context is achieved through a collective effort, and is not based on one man’s performance alone. Unfortunately, some work environments appear to motivate people to keep working on their personal goals so as to accomplish personal gain.

This can be observed through different award, recognition, and compensation packages that are in place to highlight the achievements of individual employees. Most companies, organizations, or businesses, though, are guilty of overlooking this pretty common notion.

To explain further, most team or business leaders give out promotions and appraisals which are based on performance. They create performance management tools and organize goal setting mechanisms which are based not from a team building perspective, but on one which puts emphasis and due regard on individual goals.

These very same factors also usually become the cause of conflicts within the team since disputes, intrigue, jealousy, and differences could pop out of these supposedly best practices.
